THE OLD PATHS

By Michael Pearl

Hope for the Family

Question from a Father:
I have raised three girls and they all turned out well. My last child is a boy who has just turned fourteen. I am seeing signs of trouble and need some advice. I don't think I know how to raise a boy. He is unhappy with his circumstances in life. He feels that I am depriving him of friends and opportunities to experience life. He wants a cell phone so he can share with others on social media. He wants to “hang out” with guys that I do not have confidence share our vision for our son. My greatest concern is that it seems I do not have his respect. We are really not friends. I feel like he thinks I am an impediment to his happiness. What can I do?

Michael Answers:

If by “do” you mean some overlooked parenting technique, I must tell you there is nothing to “do.” Your child and the dynamics of your relationship are so much more complex than to be solved by the addition of some single corrective act. Think about it. If you came to me with marriage difficulty and asked for something you could “do” to cause your wife to suddenly respect and like you, and drop all her grievances, would you expect it to be as simple as roses once a week or a sit-down talk? Marriage is a relationship built on many hours and many experiences. Healing requires a fundamental change in the soul of one or both individuals. Likewise, the raising of a child is a complex relationship, even more complex than marriage due to changing hormones. It is a good thing that there are only about four or five years before a post-pubertal child is weaned from his parents as a young adult, no longer under family mandates. If the relationship that exists from thirteen to eighteen years of age lasted twenty years instead of five, 95% of kids would soon divorce their parents. It is the sure knowledge that their servitude will be over in just a few years that gives hope to disgruntled teenagers.

Yeah, I know, this sounds dark and hopeless. Yet there is a way. But it comes at a price higher than most parents are willing to pay, for in many cases it requires a change of heart and a change of lifestyle—maybe a change of occupation and the community in which you live.

I look around at families I have known and observed since the parents were teenagers or younger, their children now grown and married or of marriageable age, and I see mixed results. Some are dismal failures and others are a delight to God—an expression of heaven. I can see the root causes of successes or failures, and it is not as most would think. On one extreme, I know parents who smoked tobacco and pot and drank moderately who were nonetheless a raging success as parents—be sure, a very limited number indeed. And on the other end of the scale, I know parents who were strict, teaching their children to quote large portions of the Bible, never watching any media or mixing know the causes and effects.

In most cases success is not due to any forethought or deliberation by the parents; they just pass on their hearts and temperament in a natural context incidentally suited to raising good kids. It’s the “old paths”—what average Christian, rural families were seventy-five years ago. Our society is no longer Christian and no longer natural. Community is not natural. Family is not natural. Education is not natural. And child training is not natural. There are still small pockets where young men and women come to marriage bringing with them a relaxed worldview and lifestyle that will result in good kids, but every year that circle becomes exponentially smaller.

In an age where the old paths are mostly forgotten, it takes careful planning and deliberate, patient execution to guarantee success in raising children. If you didn’t inherit a lifestyle, community, temperament, and worldview that are conducive to raising good kids, you must make the sacrifices necessary to reestablish a working form of the old paths.

What are the old paths of which I speak, and how can you reclaim a culture you never experienced or inherited? I will recount the common characteristic I have observed in successful families.

A family that works together stays together. A family that strives together thrives together. A family that is a working team, striving toward a common goal, will engender loyalty in their children. Things like feeding the animals, collecting eggs, butchering chickens so you will have meat on the table after church on Sunday, repairing the barn, or adding on a bedroom so the kids can spread out are examples. Taking the boys to work where they learn a trade is invaluable. Even the girls feel better about themselves when they have operated a weed eater, bringing in money to enhance the quality of life for the whole family.

The child who is not needed as part of the team will gravitate toward loyalties outside the family. Participation cannot be staged or fabricated. It must be real. The child who is not truly needed for the survival and well-being of the family will not develop holy pride and righteous ambition. He will turn to video games, social media, and friends who just “hang” together, talking about how the world “sucks.”

Back to the letter that prompted this discussion: You say you raised three good girls. But boys are quite different from girls in what satisfies their aspirations. Boys have a greater need to explore, invent, achieve something objective, conquer, and compete. They have a need to be meaningfully engaged in pursuits that yield objective results, like rebuilding automobiles, painting a house, cutting firewood, building something that others will admire. They are little kings looking to build a kingdom and furnish it. Idleness (including entertainment) breeds self-loathing and wanderlust.

If you are not skilled in the “manly” arts, there are alternate ways to provide expression for your boys. It is subpar but better than nothing. You can loan them out to Christian friends who are active in welding, mechanics, farming, construction, lawn care, building of any kind, etc. The problem with letting someone else apprentice them is that they will bond with and respect the other man instead of you. But, again, it is far better than video games, social media, and “hanging out.”

If you are a city slicker with a business or job that prevents your children from participating, there is an effective alternative to physically working together to achieve daily sustenance. Families that minister together and see positive results in the lives of others will raise delightful kids. When daily life is filled with prayer, counseling, teaching, and assisting others less fortunate, the children will grow up totally satisfied. But beware—Pharisaical, religious business will drive them away. Children are usually uncorrupted psychologists who see through religious pretense.

It is the satisfaction of achieving and conquering together that satisfies the soul of the child. The struggle to maintain shelter and food, as would be the case with an indigenous farmer, is the most natural context, but not everyone can do that. I have seen very wealthy families maintain the loyalty and respect of their children because they sit around the dinner table and share their vision for expansion of the business, involving the children in the enterprise. At the earliest ages, the children are given jobs to do at the office that are meaningful. Projects at home focus on the children rising to challenges. A new pool and garden can be planned by the children and they can help the workmen. One wealthy father told me that in contracting out some remodeling, he told the carefully selected bidders that their bids should include apprenticing his two boys. They were to work alongside the crew every day for the entire six months. Mother can arrange for the children to work at a local shelter or to teach Good News Clubs through Child Evangelism Fellowship. The family can “adopt” several widowed grandmothers and make weekly visits to assist them, even painting their dilapidated home and taking them shopping.

A busy life that is filled with productivity on the behalf of others produces a satisfied soul. An empty life of self-indulgence becomes boring and agitates the soul to seek satisfaction and excitement in carnal pursuits and worldly friends equally empty of heart and mind.

Self-respect is achieved the same way and for the same reason we respect others. It is based on integrity, hard work, sacrifice for others, expressions of compassion and mercy, justice, etc. When children act worthy they will feel worthy. Positive affirmation is only useful when it is in recognition of a job well done.

As you can see, the answer to the question is simple but not an easy, quick fix. I said it may require a complete change of lifestyle. Most parents are so wed to their social circle, church, vocation, and comfort zone that they will not take my advice. You will not want your daughters to marry their sons or vice versa. But there is no way to mold a child into the image of Christ if they are allowed to grow up in a different mold.

POSITIVE AFFIRMATION IS ONLY USEFUL WHEN IT IS IN RECOGNITION OF A JOB WELL DONE.

You, Father, are the head of the house. Raise your children in Sodom and you will have results no better than Lot. Build your house on a rock and the children will survive the storm.

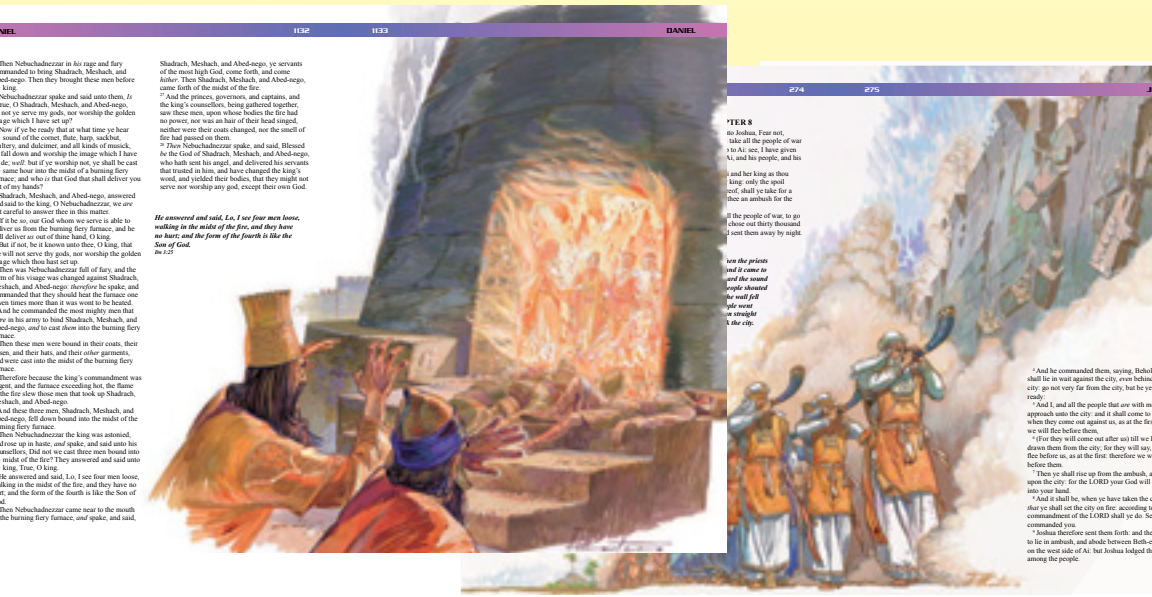

There are other factors that are critical to raising good kids, some of which I have discussed in other articles and books, particularly Strong in Spirit. Space does not allow a thorough treatise of our subject—though what I have said here is universal and fundamental. Maybe in the next magazine I will expand upon it. ■

Having a life of joy and thanksgiving is the most powerful child-training tool because it naturally provokes a child to want to have and be what he values.

You can give a child the best education, provide many extra activities such as sports or music, pour your life into creating “quality time,” and make available every good thing money can buy, but still have a discontented kid. There is a basic need in all humans that most parents wrongly assume children lack. ALL people—young and old, male and female—have a natural need to be productive. Innate in all of us is the deep need to create, build, heal others, personally help those in need, and do something that has lasting merit. A child who is not put in a position to be genuinely needed for his contribution to the family will feel his lack of worth. This feeling will lead to either discontentment, self-destructive acts, rebellion (because he will blame you for his feeling of failure), and/or depression. This is why “school as usual” can be so counterproductive. Children need to be learning real-life skills with which to serve others.

Your job as a parent is to find a way for your child to fulfill his God-given drive to be a giver.

FROM OUR Mailbox

Dear Mike and Debi,

Simply writing to say thank-you for your teaching ministry to families. TTUAC entered our lives in 1998 when my Christian friend had a copy on her table. It was in a big stack of Christian life books.

She said "Careful with that one! It is truth and when you read it you will be accountable to what you've learned!"

Well, almost 20 years later, our children are grown. The married ones are thriving in their relationships/families. The unmarried one is heading to _____ where he will be a missionary for 6 months.

Praise God for fulfilling His Word in our simple lives.

We are blessed. And so thankful to him and to you!

Praising Him!

HAS SOMETHING IN COMMON WITH AN EGG

by Debi Pearl

A long life will provide you with a great variety of experiences. This one was not on Deb's bucket list. She never imagined it and now assures me she will never let this happen to her again. Once was more than enough.

Debi Writes:

What I am about to tell you is true, unembellished, and without any attempt to make you feel sorry for me. It is just what happened. It is funny so feel free to laugh.

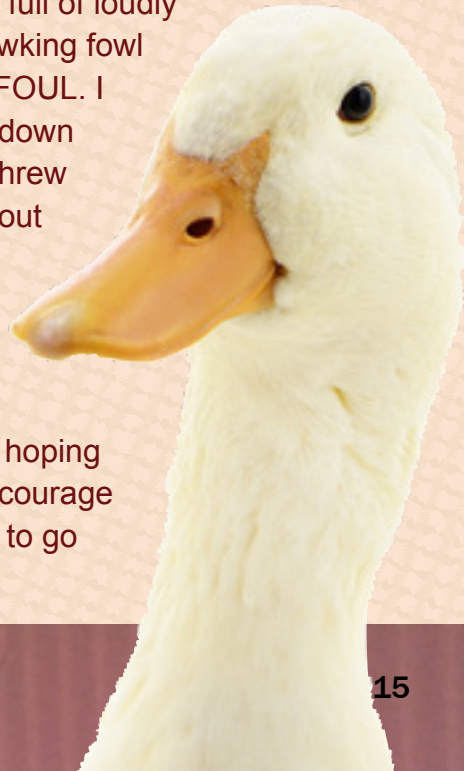

It all started several weeks before the actual event. I was sick with some strange, fever-inducing disease that left me staggering around disoriented. I was still working at the office, but my brain was way out of sync. It being summer, there were lots of garden and yard chores plus considerable extra company. And Nathan's family was traveling so they had left their cat, 3 dogs, 5 ducks, and a variety of 50 chickens for me to feed and water.

One miserable day I was in the kitchen attempting to put together a meal for us as well as the guests who were staying with us. Mike came to help. It was then I remembered I had not fed or watered the poor fowl; it was noon and really hot weather. I left Mike cooking while I rushed down the hill to the hen house.

Now, one of Nathan's kids' dogs is a hopper. He spends considerable time on his back feet hopping with extreme glee. I had not noticed this as a problem until this particular day. When I swung open the big door to the hen house, I was met with a blast of hot air. There were no chickens in the house since it was too hot. I was really glad because they are so pesky friendly. Nathan's kids raised these fowl, and the crazy chickens think they are pets. The fowl actually LIKE to be carried around and caressed. I had just bent down into the drum to scoop out the corn when that crazy hopping dog slammed the huge heavy door shut. I didn't panic. But I did scream, yell, and beat on the metal wall, which only attracted the attention of the fowl. They all rushed through the tiny opening on the floor to welcome me to their home. I still didn't panic, although the small, dim, hot room full of loudly squawking fowl was FOUL. I bent down and threw corn out the

hole, hoping to encourage

out. Some went out while the others squawked louder and pushed close in around me.

Still, I did not panic, but I was a wee bit closer to doing so. It was hot—stifling hot—loud, and I was feverish. I imagined Mike cooking and visiting. Common sense told me that he was too distracted to notice how long I was gone. I couldn't depend on him coming to rescue me. One thing I was sure of, I had to at least get my head out of the heat as I was feeling very faint and the thought of fainting in the slick fowl poop with all those creatures piling in on me was nightmarish. Did I mention that I was, as usual, wearing a skirt? Who cares, I thought. It was so terribly hot! I dropped to my knees and arched my back so I could get my head down lower than my behind. I stuck my head through the hole into that blessed 95-degree outside air. The chickens got so excited they ran to welcome me, so I had to stick my arm out to protect my face. Now, you may wonder how long a 66-year-old woman can stay in that position. I was holding myself up with one arm while the other arm was waving off kisses from ducks. One knee was holding me while the other leg was kicking off chickens that were investigating my legs, which were, of course, still inside the hen house. I lasted about 30 long seconds before I went down on my belly, slick poop and all. Now the chickens inside the house jumped on my back, and those outside fought for rights to be closest to my head. Desperate times call for quick action. I managed to get my other arm out the small opening. Wiggling like a worm,

I got my top half out but my hips were too wide to squeeze through. I have to admit, it was the giant ducks staring down at me that were the last straw. I panicked but panic is good because it unlocked a secret super-hero strength I didn't realize that I had. It was like my brain took on a whole new dimension as I suddenly knew things I never knew. I KNEW that tiny chicken door was taller than it was wide, so I flipped over on my side because my hips needed the extra 2 inches of space. Crawling on your side is not easy, especially if you're old, sick, and have fowl both inside the house pecking your bare legs and outside pecking your ears. The slick poop was now used to my advantage as I slid myself free and down the chicken ramp. All the chickens that had been stuck in the house due to me taking up their door rushed out while I was still on all fours but I WAS FREE.

Everyone at the table seemed frozen in time when I marched laughing into the kitchen, smelling and looking like poop. Those guests have a whole different perspective of me than most folks.

An update: I am well, thanks to a couple rounds of antibiotics.

Note: a special thanks to two of the sweet Rodrigues' sisters, Nurie and Kaylee, who came to help me for a few weeks so that I could get caught up on my normal work around the homestead. AND, it is with gladness I report that most of Nathan's chickens are now in his freezer. Mike and I still wake up at night laughing. He laughs the loudest. ■

My little buddy Jeremiah, now 12 years old, has been by my side most of the week, helping in significant ways. Just yesterday we were cleaning up the shop (he loves to organize things), and his job was sorting the many wrenches, sockets, and ratchets. For you mechanically illiterate dummies, those are the tools used to work on automobiles and the like. When I told Jeremiah to put the metric tools in one drawer and the standard in another, he inquired as to why they made two different kinds. Now, at the time I didn't think of it as homeschooling, but later in the evening as I was telling Deb about it, she observed that it was a quality learning experience for a 12-year-old.

LIFESTYLE

Homeschooling

by Michael Pearl

I explained to Jeremiah that throughout history different people groups developed their own methods of measurement. The US adopted the British method of feet and inches. Most of the rest of the world uses the metric system. The discussion moved to 24-hour days. And then we talked about why the circle and the earth itself are divided into 360 degrees, and each degree is divided into 60 minutes, and each minute into 60 seconds. Navigation universally employs degrees, minutes, and seconds.

Twelve inches makes a foot, denoting the length of the average man's foot. Feet and inches, yards and acres are derived from the English. A yard is the distance from the end of the king's nose to his thumb on his outstretched arm (must have been a tall king). A yard (36 inches) is the average girth of a man around the waist—my own belt size. A yard is also the length of stride of an Englishman walking briskly.

Wanting to know more about the 360-degree circle, we later resorted to Google. Not long after creation, earliest man in the Mesopotamian valley (modern Iraq, in the area that comprised the Garden in Eden) observed the annual track of the sun and the 30-day lunar cycle and assigned 360 days to a year (twelve months of 30 days each). Subsequently, the circle of the earth was divided into 360 days or degrees. Yes, they were aware that there were $365\frac{1}{4}$ days in a year (365.2422 to be exact), but they chose to round it off to be consistent with geometry as did the Hebrews later on, adding a thirteenth month when necessary to keep the seasons consistent.

After the Tower of Babel dispersed men into different languages and people groups, those who would come to be known as Egyptians employed the 360-degree division of a circle in their geometry. The Egyptians built with many triangles—the pyramid for example. As any kid with a compass will discover, the Egyptians were aware that six triangular slices of 60 degrees each equal a complete circle of 360 degrees. No doubt, when time was first recorded on a sun dial (a circle), it made sense to divide hours into 60 minutes and minutes into 60 seconds. So we can see that the 360-degree circle is suggested by physics itself, and the division of each degree into minutes and seconds (a second being the average heart beat and the most restful rhythm for music) are suggested by nature itself.

Editor's Note: Only 3 countries in the world do not use the metric system: Liberia, Myanmar and the U.S. England uses both the system of units which is similar to the Imperial system and the Metric system.

However, I could not tell Jeremiah the origin of the metric system, so we looked that up too. Together, we learned that the Chinese, Arabs, and Hindus each had their own measuring system. In the 17th century, the French developed the metric system to be more compatible with math and equations. Calculations in the metric system can be performed simply by shifting the decimal point. Thus, the metric system is a decimal (base 10) system. The length of a meter was derived by calculating one ten-millionth of the distance between the equator and the North Pole, which comes to exactly 39.37 inches. Anyone who has ever tried to use a calculator, or pencil and paper, to compute feet and inches has run into a wall of difficulty that is best resolved by resorting to the more convenient metric system.

Jeremiah and I learned together. That is the way my sons and daughters were homeschooled. They spent a little time in a classroom setting when they were four to eight years old, but by the time they could work outside, most of their education came from life experiences and inquisitive minds. Today our five children are between the ages of 33 and 43. They are able to discuss most any subject with most any professional on most any topic. This time next year that “most any topic” will be larger, as they all continue to learn. The advantage of lifestyle homeschooling is that you never graduate. It becomes a way of life. Every year advances you to a higher grade.

I cannot overemphasize the broad value of learning with your kids and grandkids. You are never an old fogey if you are learning. You remain interesting to the kids, and you become their favorite source of knowledge and wisdom. We might call this “tying strings of education.”

You can't be too ignorant to homeschool. It is not how much you know; it is how much you are learning. You don't need to communicate great things; you just need to communicate the joy of learning. Don't stand off at a distance while your children pencil in the answers to irrelevant questions, bored to death, looking forward to the day they can cease schooling. Make education a lifestyle the whole family shares. ■

Our Bible storybook Good and Evil, a graphic novel in the Marvel Comic tradition, is free online in 47 languages. Of over 150,000 views this year, up to a third revisited the site at least once to continuing learning the Bible story. The language most accessed this year was Arabic. IDEAS WE LOVE:

The Week

(by 2 sisters, each sharing their perspective)

Hello, Everyone, my name is Kaylee Rodrigues. I am 16 years old and I come from a large family of 12 children, counting me! I am going to tell you how my sweet mama makes each of us children feel special.

My mom came up with the idea of giving each of us children a whole week of special treatment starting with the oldest sibling, Nurie, who is 18, down to the second youngest who is 3 years old. This has been a great idea and all of us children greatly look forward to our week, which comes every 12 weeks. When it is your week you get to do everything special. So if it is my week and Mama and Daddy are going in a store (they don't really want to bring all 12 children into the store just to get a few groceries), they just ask, "Whose week is it?" If it is my week, then I get to go into the store with them and I can pick out a special treat. Everyone is happy for the sibling who is having the special week, even when we watch them eating a candy bar in front of us, because we know our week is soon coming up and it is exciting to think about what we will get. Also, if it is my week and I need shoes or clothes, Mama makes a special trip with me to buy what I need. One time it was my week and Mama, Grandma, and Grandpa were taking a trip to New York to visit my Aunt Amy. All of us wanted to go but the car would not fit everyone, so Mama said, “Whose week is it?” It was MINE! I was so excited and had such a great time.

I hope you understand all that I have written and I hope it gave you some good ideas for how to make your children feel special.

My name is Nurie and I am 18 years old. I am the oldest of 12 children. So many times people ask me, “Is it hard to be the oldest?” Or “Do you not want a big family because you are part of one?” And sometimes they even ask, “Do you get all the work dumped on you?” Well, I have to say that is not the case with me. My parents try hard to make sure the work load is evenly split up between all of us. Mama is very organized and is always trying to make things as equitable as possible between her children.

One of the things I really enjoy is my special week. You might be thinking, “What in the world does that mean?” Well, when we were little, my parents were trying to think of an idea to make each of us feel special: “Who should we give this candy bar to? What child should

We have noticed that big families often raise children who are more attentive to the needs of others (less selfish).

we let stay up with us to have a bowl of ice cream and watch a movie? What child should we let go in the store with us? Who gets to sit in the front?" And the list goes on. After thinking about it for a while they finally found an answer. They decided to rotate giving each one of the children their own special week. This would be a whole week of very special treatment. So anything special that comes along that week would be given to the child whose week it was.

All of us children look forward to our week. We enjoy thinking of our week coming up. We love feeling special and love the extra bonding time we have with our parents during that week. It is fun being the one getting to choose first and have all the extra little things that come our way, and even go on a date with Mama and Daddy. I also enjoy watching the other siblings have their special week. My mama and daddy have done a great job making us feel loved and special. We all love them so much! ■

Dear Mrs. Pearl,

I am 14 years old, and I have a question concerning hearing the voice of God. I think that God has told me a young man in our church is going to be my husband one day. It even seems as if He has confirmed this through several events. Is this a sign, or is it a weird thing that just lines up strangely perfect? How do I know if God is speaking to me?

~Grace

Dear Grace,

Assume that God is telling you that this man needs a special daily prayer warrior to pray for him. Write him a simple note saying, "I feel God directing me to be a prayer warrior for you. I have your back." What he needs is protection from the evil of porn, to be strong before God, and love His Word, etc. And if he is the one God has for you, then he will be a mightier man for the years you prayed for him. ~Debi
